QUEENSFERRY

The history of Queensferry goes back certainly, to Queen Margaret, wife of Malcolm Canmore, after whom the ferry crossing and town are named, and quite probably, to pre-Roman times.

By the 16th century it had obtained certain trading privileges as a Burgh of Regality owing allegiance to Dunfermline Abbey. In 1636 it became a Royal Burgh. At one time a thriving trading port, with a harbour that supporting a busy fishing industry as well as soap-making and whisky distilling, More recently, the former home of George IV and VAT 69 bottling plant and Hewlett-Packard electronics factory.

THE CONSERVATION AREA

Because of its unique character, it's fine 17th and 18th century buildings, and its undoubted historic interest, the town was designated an 'Outstanding Conservation Area' in July 1977.
